Key themes
Key themes

Intersectionality
- The intersection of all groups affected by domestic and family violence need to be considered in every part of policy.
- Need to acknowledge the multi-faceted layers of violence.
- Auditing needs to be deeper, more thorough, and be more intersectional.

Negative stereotypes
- Need to address the narrative around domestic violence and the flaws and inaccurate information that surrounds it.
- There is an incorrect assumption that the perpetrator is always an Aboriginal man when the victim is Indigenous.
- Role of the media. They reinforce these negative stereotypes.
- Need to stop thinking about Indigenous people in the deficit.

Fear and Shame
- There are risks involved with mandating reporting, as there is a general distrust of authority and government with certain Indigenous communities.
- Sexual violence is often disclosed after the initial disclosure of domestic or family violence.
- The process of reporting sexual violence is often shameful and painful, so if often revealed later, if at all.
- Sexual abuse is a huge issue and is often not disclosed in Community
  – Many young boys who have experienced this don’t receive as much help as young girls.

Data / Research
- There isn’t much research in domestic and family violence specifically around Indigenous people.
- When there is research done, it’s often done with a siloed approach.
- There needs to be more information sharing.
- What are the origins of violence?
- What are the experiences of ATSI communities versus the general population in regards to experience of domestic and family violence

Primary prevention
- Need to have more specialised training for workers in both mainstream and Indigenous-specific domestic violence services to assist Indigenous women specifically.
- It’s vital to have workers that are culturally competent and appropriate for the community they’re working in.
- Funding is essential in the running of programs – but often the models are ‘tick and flick’ in their development and are not always good service design. They just want to tick the right boxes – not necessarily deliver the best product or service.
Key themes

Cultural considerations

- Need to develop practices around self care and develop best practice around minimising risk of vicarious trauma.
- Cultural competency needs to be a priority in mainstream organisations by both developing their worker capacity, but also learning about their local community.
- Need to uncouple ATSI specific services from mainstream services.
- Use of Language and Cultural responses is critically important.
- Should be able to utilise existing cultural resources when addressing domestic and family violence (Elders, leaders Lore / Law, etc).
- There is a need to have trauma-informed responses – this includes reactions to colonisation and genocide.
- Don’t just bring in mainstream services – help to strengthen existing Indigenous services.
- Having accredited behaviour change services is a very Western approach to this issue, and doesn’t resonate with Community.
  - Especially with Indigenous men, who regularly don’t complete these (often mandates) courses.
  - Barriers to local service providers completing these courses are often legislative and cost related.
- Assessment of programs is not done well and doesn’t include Community.

Common language

- Describing family violence service as legal service is misleading.

Focus on women

- Main investment should be in women and prevention – not necessarily perpetrators.
- Bring in a trauma-informed client lens.
- Self care is important for both victims and staff.

Giving voice to victims

- Listening to how each community explains how domestic and family violence is in their community.
- Let community have input into assessment.
- Victims need to be the architect of their own lives.
Priority actions
Priority actions

Workforce Development

• Build services with Aboriginal staff and build strength in existing ATSI controlled organisations.
• Mainstream services should be made in consultation with local ATSI people and have KPIs around minimum amount of ATSI members.
• Look at the funding that goes into these organisations.
• Address the power imbalances that can exist between these organisations and victims of domestic and family violence and build trust with participants.
• Make sure that organisations gain the trust of Community before they work in it.
• There is often a huge turnover of staff in these support organisations for victims.
  – There is also difficulty hiring staff, especially in remote and mining areas.
  – How can we get people to stay in these regions? Often with mainstream organisations, victims and community have to deal with a new person every month.
  – These is no trust in these relationships and it goes both ways.
• Need to work with communities to find the solution. They know what they need as well as how to provide it.
• There are too many services that are serving a small population, but people are still slipping through the gaps.
  – Have a regional forum to identify gaps and what is needed and if all organisations in the region are necessary.
  – There is a need to have an audit of services and make these ‘fly in, fly out’ organisations accountable.

Programs

• Local-based development must occur. Local people understand their community and the challenges they face.
• Co-design approach to program design. Should work with ATSI community to get a deep understanding of the nature of the issue.
• Indigenous people come from inter-dependent, collectivist cultures. There is a level of complexity that needs to be addressed.
• Lack of funding limits and constrains good practice.
• Need to acknowledge that these is diversity within and between communities.
  – Move away from a ‘one size fits all’ model.
  – A program that work in one community won’t necessarily work across all communities.
• Some Indigenous people have become disconnected from culture.
  – Important to teach kids Language, Ceremony; and strengthen culture.
Priority actions

Prevention

- Need to have a framework that reflects ATSI values.
- Model should be respectful.
- What does prevention look like in the Aboriginal space around violence?
- Understanding drivers of violence:
  - Not always about power and control.
  - Adopting the role of the oppressor.
  - Introduced colonisation.
- Acknowledge how first contact has shifted familial roles:
  - People are treated in a way that isn’t equitable.
  - ATSI people are excluded from decision making.
  - “Things are done for us, not by us.”
  - How do you bring balance back to reflect respectful relationships?
- Targeted approach at children as well as towards women.

- How does the wider community value our culture?
  - Need to not be seen as part of the problem.
- Need to move from punitive model to a health and wellbeing model.
- Strengthen Cultural education
  - Share across wider community as well as Indigenous community.
- Vital to include community members that have used or experienced violence.
- Current model includes feminist theory – but also needs queer theory, decolonization, etc. in order to be more intersectional.
- Indigenous need to be part of all evaluation – not just a tack on at the end.
